The solemnity and the sarcasm with which this point was debated by different sections of the German Press rendered the reception of the Mission an anti-climax. The German adventure in China was too prolonged to suit the temper of the German people. Count Waldersee returned home in June, 1901, but long before then it had been officially admitted that the nation was tired of China (China-miide). The practical achievement of the enterprise had been the signature of the Anglo-German Agreement (October, 1900), establishing anew the principles of the open door and of the territorial integrity of China, with the limitations illustrated by the Russian occupation of the Liao-Tung peninsula, the German seizure of Kiao-Chau, the Shantung Treaty, and the British occupation of...
