And while all this is going on in the field of theory, sinister forces which have but recently been expelled from one sinecure are readjusting themselves to their new institutional environment. Probably no one supposes today that it is humanly possible to construct a social order in which there will be no flaw. The social reform which deals effectively with one institutional defect can hardly avoid leaving others. A Standard Oil magnate who died recently is reputed to have defied the country to devise antimonopolistic legislation faster than the great trusts can find other ways of exercising the same monopolistic powers. It is inevitable, therefore, that under the new order of things which ensues after a period of social reform great financial forces will grow up which owe their then form and size to the reorganized social system, and will hence be ready to fight for its perpetuation. Thus in the natural course of events economic theory becomes aligned with those who live by profit. Cf. Hamiltons The Price-System and Social Policy, Journal of Political Economy, XXVI, 31. At the same time, however, economic doctrine is by no means wholly divorced from the actual problems of the industrial world. During the entire period of acquiescence which succeeds the formulation--for purposes of fundamental reform--of a polemical doctrine there still remains the task of extending the reform movement to every cranny of the vast social edifice. Thus, while the development of economic doctrines...
