Excerpt: .be made to yield a longer supply than is often the case. Plants of the Autumn Giant coming in too quickly should be heeled over. If they are too far gone for this, lifting with a ball and placing under a north wall will prolong the crop. Small heads just turning in may be retarded by tying up the leaves over them. This not only preserves them from sun and rain, which soon discolour them, but protects from early frost. The succession plants for later supplies are much safer treated thus, and will be of better colour when cooked. I find the Self-protecting Broccoli invaluable for late autumn supplies, following closely upon the Cauliflower, which it closely resembles, but it is more selfprotecting. A good breadth of this will keep up the supply till the end of the year if the plants are sheltered. Draw more soil now up to the plants, as this protects the stem and allows more air to circulate around them; dwarfed growth is the result. Any decaying leaves should be removed and the plants kept free from weeds. Use the hoe occasionally between the plants. Any lateplanted plots require all the light and air possible. Early Celery.--The final earthing up of the earlier plants should be done, especially if the heads are required for October use. I always leave the moulding up as long as possible, as a much sturdier growth results. If Celery is backward it is impossible...
